It is clear that technology already has much to offer in terms of providing and improving access to better mental healthcare. It is, therefore, reasonable to ask why more has not already been done to take advantage of these tools. Traditional challenges to adoption, such as a lack of funding or the faith in conventional treatment, play a part, but there is also an understanding within the industry that greater use of new and existing technologies in this space requires policy-makers and practitioners to navigate a complex web of ethical dilemmas, particularly in areas such as data privacy and individuals' rights). The general nervousness surrounding this journey is understandable, but it has resulted in a reluctance to develop and scale technology-based initiatives that could improve – and save – large numbers of lives.

Given these findings, it is essential for governments, policy-makers, business leaders), and practitioners to step up and address the barriers keeping effective treatments from those who need them. Primarily, these barriers are ethical considerations and a lack of better, evidence-based research. Many mental health- focused apps do not report evidence from peer-reviewed controlled clinical trials to support their effectiveness and even for those that do, rapid advances in technology may render the research outdated. Furthermore, the absence of a consensual, globally harmonious, ethical and big-data framework has led to companies adopting their own consent, transparency, privacy and data policies.

The Global Future Council on Technology for Mental Health will examine the strengths and limitations of emerging technologies, especially AI (Artificial Intelligence) and ML (Machine Learning), for mental healthcare applications. It will highlight the work needed to scale the adoption of technology, in a fair and evidence-based manner, to ensure that everyone, everywhere, who is facing mental ill-health, can get the help they seek.
